

Solutions in Health and Safety Management - Helping you establish, implement and improve your system

Under the Health and Safety at Work Act 1974 and the Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1999 your organisation should implement an effective system of health and safety management. In the United Kingdom the approach usually taken is through the following five elements of HSG 65.

Policy, which demonstrates what you are wanting to achieve, who is going to achieve it and how it is going to be achieved.

Organisation, which is concerned with the allocation of roles and responsibilities, culture, control, competence, co-operation and communication.

Planning and Implementation, which is concerned with the setting of appropriate standards, objectives and how you get these established and recognised within the organisation.

Measuring Performance, which includes both active and reactive monitoring of performance and uses inspection, sampling, surveys and tours as well as accident and incident investigation.

Reviewing Performance, which is the organisation's ability to use its measurement of performance in order to make judgements about its own performance sometimes using tools such as benchmarking. This is used to effect improvements.

Audit is used to determine the effectiveness of each of the five elements of the management system by making evidence based judgements using observation, discussion, study of documentation, measurement and possibly photographic record.

JRL Solutions Ltd is also equipped to provide solutions for organisations wanting to use other systems such as British, European and International Standards.
